8. The aim of this royal decree is to bring the legislation for bread (normal bread and speciality bread products) into line with current market demands.

The standard ensures fair competition among operators, which in turn helps improve competitiveness within the sector, thus enhancing innovation and the development of new products, as well as ensuring that consumers are given adequate information to facilitate their choice of purchase.

9. Given the numerous amendments made to the technical health regulations for bread and speciality bread products, and the advances in technology seen within the sector for the manufacture and marketing of these products since Royal Decree 1137/1984 was published, as well as changes in consumer trends, it is recommended that an in-depth review of the aforementioned regulations be carried out. This involves including definitions for new products, e.g. sourdough breads. Despite being made according to customary practices, something which is now important for consumers, these products had neither been defined nor included in said regulations.

It has also been deemed necessary to include other regulations, e.g. those governing the traditional way of making bread or marketing at point of sale.
